THE SECOND DECADE

1910 - 1919

Black Spot No. 3, 1919, oil 24" x 16"
by GEORGIA O'KEEFFE

FOREWORD

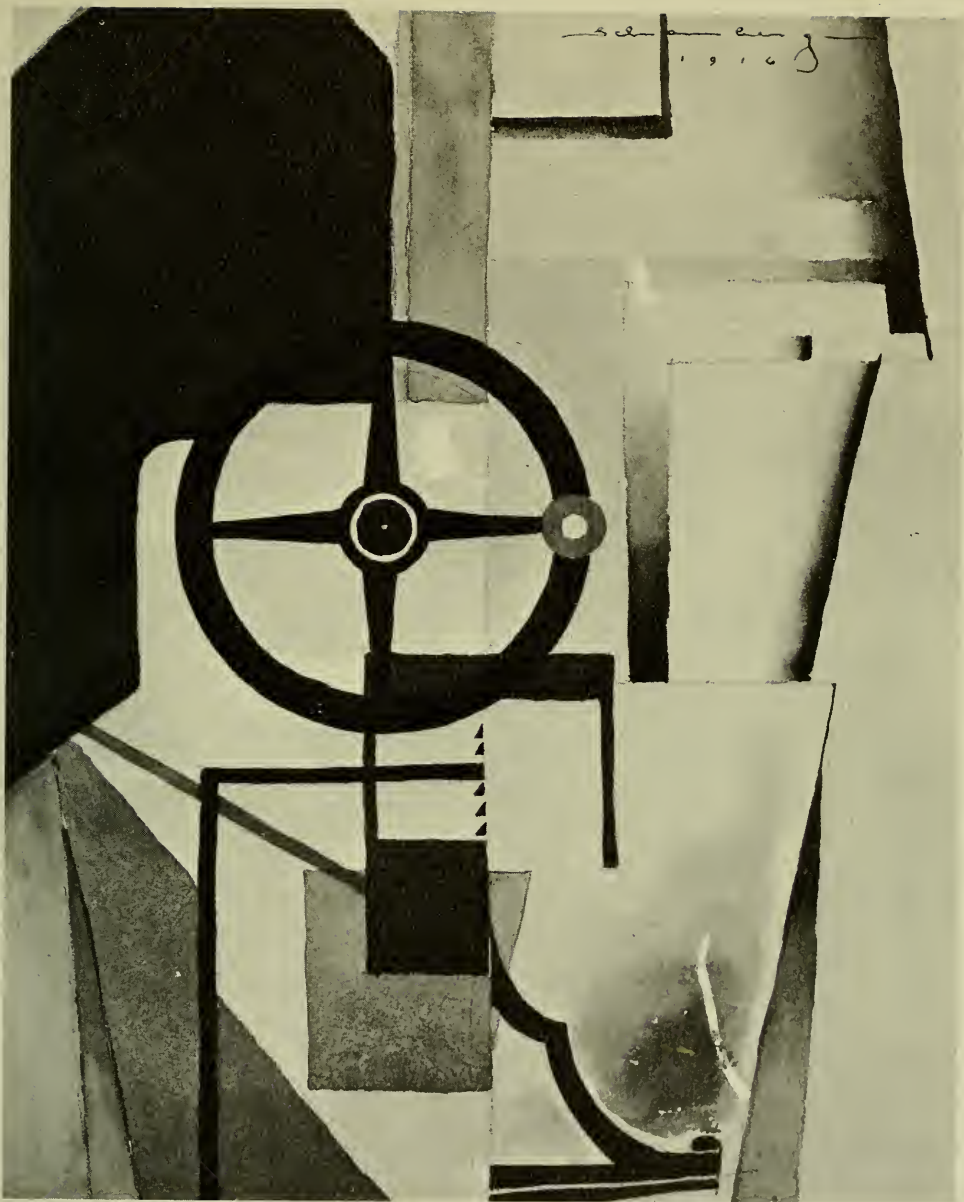

The period between 1910 and 1919 saw the conception of modern art in America.

The Armory Show of 1913 made us aware of the revolution then taking place in Europe and was certainly the single most important event of the decade. The Forum Exhibition 3 years later, with a more limited and "critical" selection of American artists, stressed for the first time a denial of the significance of subject matter, a key critique in post-Cezannesque painting. In 1914, the Synchromists, Stanton MacDonald-Wright and Morgan Russell, exhibited their work at the Carroll Gallery. Their experiments with color in relation to space and the building of forms were early ventures in complete abstraction.

Alfred Stieglitz, one of the first to appreciate and foster the small group of experimental artists, spoke of artistic creation as an end in itself and the creative act as a mystic phenomenon. As early as 1908 and throughout the next decade Stieglitz introduced to the American public such artists as Marin, Maurer, Hartley, Weber, Dove, Carles, O'Keeffe, Bluemner, Walkowitz and MacDonald-Wright. These names today stand synonymous with innovation in American modernism.

This exhibition pays homage to Alfred Stieglitz who, more than any individual, pioneered the introduction of the avant-garde.
